Course description: This course is a survey of careers in the health field with emphasis on current nursing education and nursing practice. NURSING 50 is designed to help the student identify strengths and weaknesses affecting that individual's admission into the nursing program. Information about applying for De Anza's Associate Degree in Nursing Program are the process of student selection is discussed during this course.

Course objectives: The student will:

- compare and contrast the various careers in the health field with those in nursing.
- examine the impact of nursing history.
- evaluate the terms "science," "art," "academic degree," "credential/credentialing," "certificate/certification," "license/licensing," and "profession" as each applies to nursing.
- differentiate among various nursing programs as to length of "primary preparation site" and level of preparation.
- compare the major nursing organizations as to membership and goals.
- analyze the impact of social change and social policy on health care.
- determine, based upon employer's expectations, your own opportunities and potential for success in the field of nursing today.
- identify the appropriate quarter for application to the nursing program.
